

University of Nebraska - Lincoln

DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln

University of Nebraska Press -- Sample Books and Chapters

University of Nebraska Press

2014

Dawnland Voices

Siobhan Senier

Follow this and additional works at: <http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/unpresssamples>

Senier, Siobhan, "Dawnland Voices" (2014). University of Nebraska Press -- Sample Books and Chapters. 287.
<http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/unpresssamples/287>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the University of Nebraska Press at DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln. It has been accepted for inclusion in University of Nebraska Press -- Sample Books and Chapters by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln.

DAWNLAND VOICES

Buy the Book

PUBLICATION OF THESE VOICES
IS SUPPORTED BY A GRANT BY
Jewish Federation of Greater Hartford

Buy the Book

DAWNLAND VOICES

AN ANTHOLOGY OF INDIGENOUS WRITING FROM NEW ENGLAND

Edited by Siobhan Senier

JAIME BATTISTE

LISA BROOKS

STEPHANIE M. FIELDING

JUANA PERLEY

CHERYL STEDTLER

TRUDIE LAMB RICHMOND

DONALD SOCTOMAH

JOAN TAVARES AVANT

RUTH GARBY TORRES

CAROL DANA

DAWN DOVE

UNIVERSITY OF NEBRASKA PRESS | LINCOLN AND LONDON

Buy the Book

© 2014 by the Board of Regents of the University of Nebraska

Acknowledgments for the use of copyrighted material appear on pages 683–90, which constitute an extension of the copyright page.

All rights reserved
Manufactured in the United States of America

Library of Congress
Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Dawnland voices: an anthology of indigenous writing from New England / edited by Siobhan Senier, Jaime Battiste, Juana
Perley, Donald Soctomah, Carol Dana, Lisa
Brooks, Cheryl Stedtler, Joan Tavares Avant,
Dawn Dove, Stephanie M. Fielding, Trudie
Lamb Richmond, Ruth Garby Torres.

pages cm

Includes bibliographical references.

ISBN 978-0-8032-4686-7 (paperback)

ISBN 978-0-8032-5680-4 (epub)

ISBN 978-0-8032-5681-1 (mobi)

ISBN 978-0-8032-5679-8 (pdf)

1. Indians of North America—Literary collections. 2. American literature—Indian authors.
3. American literature—New England.
4. New England—Literary collections.

I. Senier, Siobhan, 1965– editor of compilation.

PS508.I5D38 2014

810.8'0897074—dc23

2014009614

Set in Scala by L. Auten.
Designed by N. Putens.

CONTENTS

xxiii Acknowledgments

- 1 Introduction by
Siobhan Senior

MI'KMAQ

- 21 Introduction by
Jaime Battiste

Chief Stephen Augustine

- 27 Mi'kmaq Creation Story

Grand Council of the Mi'kmaq Nation

- 29 The Covenant Chain

*Elsie Charles Basque
(b. 1916)*

- 56 From Here to There

Rita Joe (1932–2007)

- 61 From Song of Rita Joe

Daniel N. Paul (b. 1938)

- 63 From We Were Not the Savages

Marie Battiste (b. 1949)

- 79 Structural Unemployment:
The Mi'kmaq Experience

*James Sakej Youngblood
Henderson (b. 1944)*

- 82 Mi'kmaq Treaties

Lorne Simon (1960–1994)
85 From Stones and Switches

Lindsay Marshall (b. 1960)
90 Clay Pots and Bones
91 Mainkewin? (Are You Going to Maine?)
92 Progress

Jaime Battiste (b. 1979)
93 From “Understanding the Progression of Mi’kmaq Law”

Alice Azure (b. 1940)
97 Repatriation Soliloquy
100 Mi’kmaq Haiku
100 Someday I Will Dance

Starlit Simon (b. 1983)
102 Without a Microphone
103 In Quest of Road Kill

106 Notes
106 Further Reading

MALISEET

113 Introduction by
Juana Perley

Gabriel Acquin (1839–1901)
115 Pictograph

Chief James Paul
117 Letter to Edward Sapis, 1911

*Henry “Red Eagle” Perley
(1885–1972)*
118 The Red Man’s Burden

Shirley Bear
134 Freeport, Maine
134 History Resource Material
135 Baqwa’sun, Wuli
Baqwa’sun
137 September Morning
137 Fragile Freedoms

- Andrea Bear Nicholas*
- 139 Linguicide, the Killing of Languages, and the Case for Immersion Education

- Chief Brenda Commander*
(b. 1958)
- 145 Open Letter to
Barack Obama

- Mihku Paul (b. 1958)*
- 147 The Ballad of Gabe Acquin
- 150 The Water Road
- 151 Return
- 152 20th Century
PowWow Playland
- 153 Trade in the 21st Century
- 154 Notes
- 156 Further Reading

PASSAMAQUODDY

- 161 Introduction by
Donald Soctomah
- Sopiel Soctomah (1755–1820)*
- 163 Wampum Reading
- Chief Francis Joseph Neptune*
(1735–1834)
- 164 Speech, 1813
- Deacon Sockabasin*
(1790–1888)
- 165 Save the Fish and Wildlife and Return Our Land!
- Joseph Stanislaus*
(1800–1880)
- 166 “You don’t make the trees . . .”
- Sopiel Selmore (1814–1903)*
- 167 Megaque’s Last Battle
- Tomah Joseph (1837–1914)*
- 168 The Power of One’s Will

	Lewis Mitchell (1847–1930)		Dawna Meader (b. 1959)
170	Speech before the Maine State Legislature, 1887	183	Gordon Island
172	Letter to Charles Godfrey Leland	184	Seasons
		185	Dream of the Hunter's Dance
	Sylvia Gabriel (1929–2003)		Susie Mitchell Sutton (b. 1963)
173	Wounded Be
174	From Dusk to Dawn	186	My Story of the Dragonfly and My Sister Rae- Lee and My mom!
	Peter Mitchell (1929–1978)		Wendy Newell Dyer (b. 1964)
175	Open Letter to Americans
	Mary Ellen Stevens Socobasin (1947–1988)	188	A Warrior's Homecoming
176	Passamaquoddy Girl		Russell Bassett (b. 1967)
	Donald Soctomah (b. 1955)	191	A Measure of Timelessness
178	Skicin Love	192	Majestic Beauty
178	Forever Tribal Love	192	Of Life from Life
179	Sacred Color Red	193	One Aspect of the Journey of Life
	Vera Francis (b. 1958)		Kani Malsom (b. 1969)
180	Technology Meets Ecology: Passamaquoddy Bay	194	To My Brothers
			Rolfe Richter (b. 1969)
		195	"Spring drew its first breath the previous day . . ."
			Christine Downing (b. 1972)
		196	A Summer Day in Motahkomikuk

- Maggie Neptune Dana*
(b. 1973)
- 198 Coming Together
- 199 Sacred Hoop Ceremony

- Marie Francis* (b. 1975)
- 200 Diminished Dreams

- Natalie Dana* (b. 1985)
- 202 Listen
- 202 Fragmented People
- 203 With This Pencil

- Jenny Soctomah* (b. 1985)
- 204 “The spirit is deep within us . . .”

- Ellen Nicholas* (b. 1987)
- 205 The Heart of Sipayik
- 206 Sipayik Reservation 1974

- Cassandra Dana* (b. 1992)
- 210 Kci Woliwon
- 211 Notes
- 211 Further Reading

PENOBSCOT

- 215 Introduction by Carol Dana

Penobscot Governors and Indians in Council

- 217 Maine State Power

Joseph Nicolai (1827–1894)

- 219 The Scribe of the
Penobscots Sends Us
His Weekly Message

Molly Spotted Elk
(1903–1977)

- 223 We’re In the Chorus Now
- 227 Geegis
- 227 “I’m free in the world of these carpeted hills . . .”
- 227 “Some ten or few years so ago or more . . .”

- 228 Baby Girl
- 229 The Lost Soul of the Wilderness
- 229 The Dreamer—Moodas
(The Dream Spirit)
- 230 Northern Lights

Fred Ranco (1932–2008)

- 231 The Avenger

	ssipsis (b. 1941)		John Bear Mitchell (b. 1968)
233	Injun Laugh	256	What's It Like Today? (from the Ulnerbeh series)
237	Gewh Huz
	Donna Loring (b. 1948)		Sherri Mitchell (b. 1969)
239	The Dark Ages of Education and a New Hope: Teaching Native American History in Maine Schools	260	Nokomis Speaks: Message to the Seventh Generation
		262	Sky Woman
		263	The Lodge
	Carol Dana (b. 1952)		Nick Bear (b. 1985)
243	Penobscot Home Nation	264	Dry Funk
244	We're Like the Moss on the Rock	265	gladly
244	Caribou Lake Winter	266	Treaty of 2010
245	"Mother of three didn't know . . ."	267	february weather makes me feel like this
246	"Pensive in her rocking chair . . ."	268	Notes
247	Children	269	Further Reading
247	A Walk to Ktadhin
	Rhonda Frey (1955–2009)
249	Growing Up with Stereotypes: A Native Woman's Perspective

	Claudia Mason Chicklas (1926–2008)
297	A Profile in Courage
299	Aunt Mary and Uncle Frank
	Joseph Bruchac III (b. 1942)
301	From Bowman's Store
303	Burial Places along the Long River
305	Ndakinna
<hr/>
ABENAKI
275	Introduction by Lisa Brooks
	Samuel Numphow
278	Letter to Thomas Henchman
	Kancamagus
280	Petitions, c. 1685
281	Petition at No. 2, Kwinitew, 1747
	Joseph Laurent (1839–1917)
283	Preface to New Familiar Abenakis and English Dialogues
	Henry Lorne Masta (1853–?)
288	From Abenaki Indian Legends, Grammar and Place-Names
	Robert James Tahamont (1891–?)
291	Chief Teedyuscung
291	The Masquerade Ball
	Stephen Laurent (1909–2001)
293	The Abenakis of Vermont
	Carol Willette Bachofner (b. 1947)
307	Abenaki Divorce
308	Winter Bringer
308	In the Abenaki Manner
309	Naming Water
309	Wazôliinebi
310	The Old Man's Walk
311	Planting Moon Kikas
311	Burial Dress
312	Jibaaki
	Cheryl Savageau (b. 1950)
313	Poison in the Pond
316	Smallpox
320	Where I Want Them
321	Swift River—Kancamagus
322	Before Moving on to Plymouth from Cape Cod—1620
323	Amber Necklace
324	Trees
325	Looking for Indians
327	French Girls Are Fast

Donna Laurent Caruso
(b. 1951)

- 329 The Removal Period
- 333 Nnd Haiku: A Trilogy
- 334 Abenaki Filmmaker
Earns Luminaria Award

Margaret M. Bruchac
(b. 1953)

- 336 War Wounds: Sophie
Senecal Goes to Washington
- 341 Praying Spoils the Hunting

Suzanne S. Rancourt
(b. 1959)

- 344 Take From My Hair—Memories
of Change
- 346 Thunderbeings
- 347 Fanning Fire
- 347 Singing Across the River
- 348 Even When the Sky Was Clear
- 349 When the Air Is Dry

James Bruchac (b. 1968)

- 351 Tracking My Nature

Jesse Bruchac (b. 1972)

- 361 Gluskonba's Fish Trap
(Klosk8ba Adelahigan)
- 366 Notes
- 366 Further Reading

NIPMUC

- 373 Introduction by Cheryl
Watching Crow Stedtler

Wowaus (James Printer,
c. 1640–c. 1709)

- 374 Note Tacked to a
Tree, Medfield,
Massachusetts, 1676[?]

- 375 Ransom Note for
Mary Rowlandson

Ebenezer Hemenway
(1804–c. 1878)

- 376 On the Death of His Mother, February 17, 1847

Zara Ciscoe Brough
(1919–1988)

- 378 Days of Hassanamesit

Corrine Bostic (1927–1981)

- 382 Ballad for Bubba
- 385 Dedication to the Young:
Cuttin' a Spoonful
- 385 Touchstones
- 385 Slatemen
- 386 For Teachers: A
Self-Reminder

	Richard Spotted Rabbit Massey (1934–2012)		Cheryl Watching Crow Stedtler (b. 1960)
387	Hepsibeth Bowman Crosman Hemenway, 1763–1847	400	Honoring a Father and a Son
	Edwin W. Morse Sr. (Chief Wise Owl, 1929–2010)	402	Full Circle
388	Chief Wise Owl's Prayer	402	Never Too Late to Dance
	Kitt Little Turtle (George Munyan, 1940–2004)	403	"Circle low . . ."
389	Coyote Spirit	403	Pressed
390	Nipmuck Legend		Cheryll Toney Holley (b. 1962)
391	Legend about Hobbamock	404	A Brief Look at Nipmuc History
391	The Heat Moon		Bruce Curliss (b. 1965)
	Nancy Bright Sky Harris (b. 1952)	411	"Authentic," Power, and Stuck in My Craw
392	To Carol and David with Love	413	Woman, Mother, Sister, Daughter, Lover
393	Woman of the Warrior		Larry Spotted Crow Mann (b. 1967)
394	Wind from Summer	418	From "Deal Me In"
394	The Gifted Porcupine Roach Maker	421	Heart in the Clouds
395	Creator of Life	422	The Crow
395	Hear Your People		Sarah "She Paints Horses" Stedtler (b. 1997)
396	There Was a Time	423	The Fresh Water People
	Hawk Henries (b. 1956)	423	An Indian Gathering
397	Carrying the Flute	424	Indians
		424	The Dancer's Foot
		424	Notes
		425	Further Reading

	Helen Manning (1919–2008)
450	From Moshup's Footsteps
	Frank James (Wamsutta, 1923–2001)
455	National Day of Mourning
	Helen Attaquin (1923–1993)
459	How Martha's Vineyard Came to Be
461	From "There Are Differences"
	Russell Peters (Fast Turtle, 1929–2002)
464	From The Wampanoags of Mashpee
	Anne Foxx (b. 1950)
470	Historical Continuities in Indigenous Women's Political Activism: An Interview with Joan Tavares Avant
	Linda Coombs
473	Holistic History: Including the Wampanoag in an Exhibit at Plimoth Plantation
	Paula Peters
477	Wampanoag Reflections
481	Beware: Not All Terms Are Fair Game
<hr/>
WAMPANOAG
429	Introduction by Joan Tavares Avant (Granny Squannit)
	Early Texts in Massachusetts
435	Petition from Gay Head Sachem Mittark, 1681
436	Petition from Gay Head, 1749
438	Petition from Gay Head to Commissioners of New England Company
	Alfred DeGrasse (1890–1978)
439	About Poison Ivy
440	The Legend of the Red Eagle
	Mabel Avant (1892–1964)
442	Interview
447	The Voice of Our Forsaken Church

- Robert Peters (b. 1962)
- 482 Grandfather
- 483 Red Sun Rising
- Mwalim *7)/Morgan
James Peters
- 485 From A Mixed Medicine Bag
- 489 Notes
- 490 Further Reading

NARRAGANSETT

- 495 Introduction by Dawn Dove
- 498 Letters to Eleazar Wheelock
(1760s)
- Thomas Commuck
(1805–1855)
- 501 Letter to Wilkins
Updike, 1837
- 503 Letter to Elisha Potter, 1844
- The Narragansett Dawn
(1935–1936)
- 506 Editorial (May 1935)
- 509 The Boston Marathon
(May 1935)
- 509 Editorial (August 1935)
- 511 “Indian Meeting Day,”
by Fred V. Brown
(August 1935)
- 513 Narragansett Tongue:
Lesson 11 (March 1936)
- 514 Fireside Stories (July 1936)

Ella Wilcox Sekatau (1928–2014)		Nuweetooun School (2003–2009)
515	I Found Him on a Hill Top	538	“Roaring Brook,” by Lorén M. Spears
516	Life and Seasons Must Surely Change	539	“The Four Animals” and “The Three Sisters,” by Dasan Everett
516	For the Children	539	“The creator made us all . . .,” by Darrlyn Sand Fry
517	Sometimes I Wish I Could Rage Like You	540	“Sky woman falling from the sky . . .,” by Laurel Spears
518	Sure I’m Still Hanging Around
Paulla Dove Jennings		Thawn Harris (b. 1978)
519	Speeches	540	“Thank You, MET Colleagues . . .”
Dawn Dove		Eleanor Dove Harris (b. 1979)
523	Alienation of Indigenous Students in the Public School System	542	TGIF 1
526	In Order to Understand Thanksgiving, One Must Understand the Sacredness of the Gift	544	TGIF 2
John Christian Hopkins (b. 1960)		546	Letter to California State University Administration, Faculty, and Student Body
530	Troopers Lead Attack on Narragansett Reservation	The Pursuit of Happiness (2005)
533	Tarzan Brown	547	From “Happiness in Our Own Words,” by Ella Sekatau and Dawn Dove
535	William O.	550	From “Pursuit of Happiness: An Indigenous View on Education,” by Lorén M. Spears
536	Sad Country Songs	555	Notes
		555	Further Reading

		Gladys Tantaquidgeon (1899–2005)
	580	See the Beauty Surrounding Us
	581	An Affectionate Portrait of Frank Speck
		Jayne Fawcett (b. 1936)
	588	Homeland
	589	Attic Dawn
	589	Pan's Song
	590	Shantok
		Faith Damon Davison (b. 1940)
	591	Mohegan Food
		Stephanie M. Fielding (b. 1945)
	599	Remembrance
	603	The Hoop
		Sharon I. Maynard (b. 1953)
	605	Long Island Sound
	606	A Winter's Morn
		William Donehey (b. 1955)
	608	River
	609	His Lover
	609	Spirit Teacher
	610	Freedom
	611	The Course of Love
	611	Sparrow
	612	Again
		Joe Smith (b. 1956)
	613	Fade into White
<hr/>
MOHEGAN
559	Introduction by Stephanie M. Fielding
	Samson Occom (1723–1791)
562	Montaukett Tribe to the State of New York
564	Mohegan and Niantic Tribes to the Connecticut Assembly
565	"The most remarkable . . . Appearance of Indian Tribes"
	Joseph Johnson (1751–1776)
567	From His Diaries
572	Letter to Samson Occom
	Fidelia Fielding (1827–1908)
573	Man's Relationship with God
574	The Truth of Tomorrow
575	Weather
	Mary Virginia Morgan (1897–1988)
576	Address at 100th Anniversary of the Mohegan Church

*Melissa Tantaquidgeon
Zobel (b. 1960)*

617 The Window

Alysson Troffer (b. 1960)

625 The Little Girl on the Hook

Eric Maynard (b. 1976)

629 The Circle

629 “Native American Professor . . .”

*Madeline Fielding Sayet
(b. 1989)*

631 When the Whippoorwill Calls

639 Notes

639 Further Reading

SCHAGHTICOKE

643 Introduction by Trudie
Lamb Richmond and
Ruth Garby Torres

*Howard N. Harris
(1900–1967)*

645 Letter to the Department of State Parks

Irving A. Harris (1931–2005)

646 Letter to Brenden Keleher

*Trudie Lamb Richmond
(b. 1931)*

648 Why Does the Past
Matter? Eunice Mauwee’s
Resistance Was Our
Path to Survival

651 Growing Up Indian (or Trying To) in Southern
New England

*Paulette Crone-Morange
(1943–2004)*

655 From “The Schaghticoke and English Law: A Study of Community Survival”

Ruth Garby Torres (b. 1955)
662 Eulogy for Irving Harris

*Aileen Harris McDonough
(b. 1975)*
667 How I Became a
(Paid) Writer
669 On Loss

*Wunneanatsu Cason
(b. 1980)*
673 I'm Off to See the Wizard
675 Deployments and Motherhood

Garry Meeches Jr. (b. 1997)
677 Soccer
677 Polar Bear Poem
678 I Am
679 Senses: Hear
679 What Never Dies
680 Build a Poem

680 Notes
680 Further Reading

683 Source Acknowledgments

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

More people than I can name, and certainly more than I could keep track of, helped during this project, from its initial conception, to finding and contacting writers, to tracking down copyright holders, to the final layout and presentation.

I can't quite describe what a great honor it was, and how humbling, to work with these eleven community editors. They are astonishingly brilliant knowledge keepers, and their commitment to sustaining their communities and traditions is breathtaking. Each one put in countless hours pulling this material together, teaching me about local literary traditions, and conveying the importance of this project to their friends and neighbors. Their expertise is tremendous, and they shared it generously and patiently.

Additionally, all of the living writers included here contributed much more than their own work: they solicited fellow tribal members for additional writings and put up with my endless questions about locations, language, and history.

Beyond the editors and writers, there were legions of smart and selfless people who talked with me on the phone or via email, and who helped me find other writings. Some sent pieces that I was unable to include here; others read over sections, proofread or copyedited chapters in progress, or participated in the often-circuitous search for rights holders.

The University of Nebraska Press deserves special thanks for supporting this project and indeed for its decades-long commitment to Native American literature. This anthology is long and in many ways unconventional for an academic publisher. It required rather more than the usual labor and negotiation among multiple authors, copyright holders, and other parties. Matt Bokovoy and his staff (Heather Stauffer, Leif Milliken, Sabrina Stellrecht, freelancer Joy Margheim, and others) were exceptionally flexible and understanding in working with first-time authors and accommodating a diversity of approaches to print literature while maintaining the high standards for which the press is known. Academic publishing is never lucrative, but the press and the tribal editors agree that any and all royalties from the sale of this book shall be distributed evenly among the following: the Penobscot Cultural and Historic Preservation Project, the Passamaquoddy Tribal Museum, Gedakina, Nipmuc Nation Project Mishoon, the Mashpee Wampanoag Museum, the Tomaquag Indian Memorial Museum, and the Tantaquidgeon Indian Museum.

Melissa Clark donated many hours of her time and expertise to creating a map of the territory described in this book. Mapping is tricky and political business, and in the end, the tribal editors were unable to agree on a single map of indigenous homeland in the northeast. I regret that I did not recognize this much earlier in the book-making process, but I thank Melissa for her generosity and refer readers to the many excellent maps that can be found on individual tribal websites.

I am undoubtedly forgetting individuals to whom I owe some sizable debt of gratitude, and I apologize sincerely to anyone I've left out: Kate April, Rocky Bear (Maliseet), Charles Brilvitch, Wendi-Starr Brown (Narragansett), Ana Caguiat, Amy Den Ouden, Thomas Doughton (Nipmuc), Burt Feintuch, James Finley, Jessica Fish, James Francis (Penobscot), Geneva Marie Gano, Maria Girouard (Penobscot), Rae Gould (Nipmuc), Joyce Heywood (Abenaki), Luke Joseph (Passamaquoddy), Robert Leavitt, Michael LeBlanc, Dyani Lee (Narragansett), Joan Lester, Drew Lopenzina, Margo Lukens, Pauleena MacDougall, Jason Mancini, Daniel Mandell, Rodger Martin, Donna Roberts Moody (Abenaki), John Moody, Tom Silver Fox Morse (Nipmuc), Wayne Newell (Passamaquoddy), Bonnie Newsom and other members of the Penobscot Cultural Heritage Preservation Commission, Robert Dale Parker, Dan Paul (Mi'kmaq), Micah Pawling, Shoran Piper (Golden Hill Paugussett), Paul Pouliot (Abenaki), Rick Pouliot (Abenaki), Dale Potts, Kathy Sebastian (Eastern Pequot), David Slagger (Maliseet), David Stewart-Smith (Abenaki), David Watters, Margaret Way, Hilary Wyss, Bill Yellow Robe Jr. (Assiniboine).

This project would not have been possible without the support I received as the James H. and Claire Short Hayes Chair in the Humanities at the University of New Hampshire. It would also not have been possible without the countless indigenous knowledge-keepers, past and present, who have kept these literary traditions alive. In a project this size, some omissions and errors have undoubtedly slipped through. I apologize sincerely, and assume full responsibility, for all mistakes.

DAWNLAND VOICES

Buy the Book

Introduction

Siobhan Senior

Years ago, when I started thinking about this anthology, I had what I thought was a simple, practical need. I was hired to teach Native American literature, first at the University of Maine and then at the University of New Hampshire, and I wanted to include local authors. But that literature was maddeningly hard to find. Aside from two repeatedly mentioned early writers—the Mohegan minister Samson Occom and Pequot minister-activist William Apess—I kept hearing that “there just aren’t any” Native American authors in this area.

Now, I had been taught in graduate school that “there just aren’t any” is almost always a lie. So I kept looking. I did have company: like-minded colleagues, including Margaret Lukens at the University of Maine and Lisa Brooks (Abenaki), now at Amherst College.¹ With their help, I started finding writers: dazzling, contemporary poets like Cheryl Savageau (Abenaki), inventive novelists like John Christian Hopkins (Narragansett), powerful essayists like Donna Loring (Penobscot), and intriguing earlier writers like the diarist Fidelia Fielding (Mohegan) and the historian Lewis Mitchell (Passamaquoddy). I found, in fact, more indigenous New England authors than I could read, teach, or even count. More to the point, I found more than I could keep xeroxing for my classes, since works by these writers were very often out of print or unpublished. Hence the need for a ready compendium.

The idea of an anthology like this was apparently a new one. Acquaintances and even well-informed colleagues were usually surprised (“There’s Native American literature here?”). Avid readers have at least heard that Native American literature exists, but some believe “it was all oral tradition.” If they have read any Native authors at all, these are almost always from the Southwest or Great Plains. On shelves labeled “American Indian” in your local bookstore, writers from New England are almost always neglected.² That neglect, I soon learned, has deep historic and political roots and does damaging work to the indigenous people who still live here.

The myth of the “vanishing Indian” is very old, and by no means peculiar to New England: it has permeated American culture from The Last of the Mohicans to Dances with Wolves. But the myth exercises special force east of the Mississippi, where colonization happened earliest; and it takes a particular shape in New England, where European settlers have, from the beginning, been keen to install themselves as the “first” Americans.³ Yankees like to believe that Native people “died off” (or “lost”) early on and that those who didn’t die were “assimilated” or have “very little real Indian blood.” Few citizens are educated about the barrage of state and federal policies that have been consistently enacted and retooled, to this very day, to terminate Native communities in New England as well as across the rest of the United States: educational policies removing Native children from their homes and penalizing Native language use; land use policies aimed at breaking up Native collectivities; bizarre blood-quantum requirements claiming that Native identity “dissolves” with intermarriage.⁴

The writers in Dawnland Voices describe and challenge those policies in their own writings, appropriately enough, because writing has always been a key colonial tool. Historian Jill Lepore, for example, has traced how the earliest Puritan historians narrated (and renarrated) King Philip’s War (1675–76) as the effective “end” of Native presence in the Northeast. In that same century, the state of Connecticut made it illegal even to use the name “Pequot” (O’Brien 31); other states followed with similar “detribalization” laws.⁵ Soon, New England census and other records began recasting indigenous people as “colored,” “mulatto,” “French”—anything but “Indian”—in what some Native people call “pencil genocide.”⁶ And then local and town historians joined the effort. In Firsting and Lasting: Writing Indians Out of Existence in New England, Jean O’Brien (Ojibwe) reads hundreds of these town histories from Maine to Rhode Island. Year after year, she finds, local historians eulogized “the last of the tribe”—so enthusiastically and consistently, in fact, that they created a landscape “thickly populated by ‘last’” members of a given “race” (113).

The New England case illustrates why the Australian scholar Patrick Wolfe has called invasion a “structure, not an event” (2). In settler colonialism, the colonizers keep invading: first physically, with war and disease; then culturally and ideologically, with more “humane” attempts to “civilize” indigenous people; and politically and economically, through policies designed to thwart tribal self-governance. As the authors included below explain, those policies currently take the form of state blockage of tribal economic enterprise (as in Rhode Island) and interference with tribal environmental protection of traditional homelands and waterways (as in Maine). If there is one thing the culturally diverse tribal nations represented in this volume have in common, it is the enduring popular conception that they no longer exist, or that those who would assert their heritage and rights are merely “casino-grubbing” or somehow standing in the way of modern economic “development.”

Dawnland Voices thus joins an ongoing effort to help document and represent Native people’s continuous presence in New England.⁷ As you will see throughout this anthology, indigenous New Englanders have had to say it again and again: “We’re still here.”

No anthology ever satisfies all readers, and no anthology is ever complete. But even among readers, teachers, and editors who know these things, anthologies carry a heavy burden. A classroom tome like the Norton Anthology of World Literature promises comprehensive coverage. The annual Best American Poetry series implies the highest standards of taste, plus national pride. Popular collections like the Chicken Soup series offer feelings of community with other people in similar straits: the grieving, the preteen, the dog lover, even the “executive” or the “prisoner.” We might say, then, that anthologies have a politics, insofar as an anthology on your bookshelf, or your Kindle, does more than “introduce” you to a certain body of literature; an anthology can also confer membership in a particular group or a kind of distinction.

Perhaps this explains why Karen Kilcup, herself a thoughtful anthologist, has said there is no escaping this central fact: “an anthology creates a miniature canon, no matter how resistant the editor is to the vexed notions of goodness and importance” (113). Some anthologies self-consciously try to push back against this canonizing tendency. In Reinventing the Enemy’s Language: Contemporary Native Women’s Writings of North America, for instance, poets Joy Harjo (Muscogee) and Gloria Bird (Spokane) included many previously unpublished writers because they wanted specifically to represent women who had made major contributions to their tribal communities. A more recent collection, one that has greatly influenced the volume at hand, is Kristina Bross and Hilary Wyss’s Early Native Literacies in New England, which encourages readers to look for Indian literature in unexpected places: in historic petitions, for example, and even in nonalphabetic forms like baskets.

Dawnland Voices tries to follow these books' lead. In particular, it redistributes the evaluation of literary "goodness" and "importance" to a much wider range of people than the usual editorial team or individual. Our team includes one non-Native college professor (me) and eleven Native American community editors—some of them academics, some community-based intellectuals, some elders, some rising stars. During the collection and selection process, all of us consulted with much larger networks of Native and non-Native writers, teachers, readers, and scholars. The resulting volume is thus extremely varied and includes a range of pieces that you might not usually see in a collection of "literary" writings: recipes, hip-hop lyrics, blog entries, children's poems.

There is a well-established tradition of literary "recovery" that depends on a dedicated researcher toiling alone in archives to unearth forgotten writers and republish their work for new appreciation. Many lost classics, especially by women and authors of color, have been rediscovered this way. Nina Baym scoured dusty library shelves for hundreds of nineteenth-century women's novels, many of which are now back in print and taught in literature classes thanks to her study Woman's Fiction: A Guide to Novels by and about Women in America, 1820–1870 (1978). Henry Louis Gates likewise excavated African American treasures like Harriet Wilson's 1859 novel Our Nig—now republished, reexamined by other scholars, and reccelebrated in Wilson's hometown of Milford, New Hampshire.

Besides the obvious baggage associated with the word "discovery" in the context of Native Americans in the United States, it does not really describe what happened as I compiled Dawnland Voices. Very occasionally, I did manage to find a forgotten Native author in an archive: the nineteenth-century Narragansett hymnist Thomas Commuck is one example. More often, when I brought such a "discovery" to Native people, they were either already familiar with that writer or far less interested in him or her than in some others, better known within their communities.

This is instructive, I think, for the current structures awarding "credit" to academics. For example, while academic and Native communities rightly honor Barry O'Connell for his definitive edition of the writings of William Apess, many Pequot and Wampanoag people actively remembered Apess and his work long before the 1992 publication of On Our Own Ground: The Complete Writings of William Apess, a Pequot. Similarly, Annette Kolodny did something important by annotating and republishing Joseph Nicolai's 1891 Life and Traditions of the Red Man through Duke University Press in 2007, but Penobscot people had long been recirculating that book on and around Indian Island in Maine, sometimes selling ten-dollar xeroxed copies in the local gas stations and sometimes debating Nicolai's contributions to Penobscot culture and history. Academics, in other words, didn't "discover" these writers.

University-based scholars often think we know in advance what we want to ask of community collaborators, but if we are really willing to ask, and really willing to listen, they often take us in unexpected directions. Literary scholars have been, perhaps, a little slower to recognize this than anthropologists, who have a longer and deeper investment in fieldwork. Some of the best anthropologists, like Julie Cruikshank and Naomi Adelson, have found that their indigenous partners redirected and reshaped their very research questions. So I have tried hard to listen to Native people. For instance, I was interested in Commuck myself, partly because he wrote political letters in rhymed quatrains, but most Narragansett people with whom I spoke were more attached to the seemingly more homely writers of the 1935–36 magazine Narragansett Dawn. Wampanoag people at Mashpee, meanwhile, were entirely respectful of William Apess's historical work there, but it is Mabel Avant's poetry that they recite aloud at their community events. If you ask Abenaki people what books are important to them, they might show you old, well-thumbed copies of language primers by Joseph Laurent or Henry Lorne Masta. Passamaquoddy people often refer to Russell Bassett, published only on their tribal website, as one of their most beloved poets. This kind of tribal literature connects people to homeland, kin, and neighbors, to tribal language, histories, and traditions. In many cases these poems, novels, and essays are virtually unknown outside their communities—and (as Kolodny found when she annotated Nicolai) their "goodness" and "importance" are not always immediately transparent to outsiders.

Thus, even though it made for a more unwieldy, occasionally contentious, and infinitely longer publishing process, I enlisted the help of community editors. Academics who conduct what is now called "engaged" or "outreach" scholarship know that this is a serendipitous, unpredictable process, alternately frustrating and rewarding. I started by asking people I knew, usually Native scholars and writers I had invited to my classes and with whom I gradually built relationships over time, including Dawn Dove (Narragansett). In other cases, my closest contacts were unable to take on the editorial work themselves, but they put me in contact with knowledgeable people who could—for example, Stephanie Fielding (Mohegan) and Donald Soctomah (Passamaquoddy). In still other cases, I had to follow the chain of contacts much longer—sometimes for years, sometimes through blind phone calls to tribal historic preservation officers, sometimes even into email and Facebook. I connected with at least two wonderful editors—Jaime Battiste (Mi'kmaq) and Cheryl Stedtler (Nipmuc)—online long before I got to meet them face to face.

I wanted to organize this book by tribal nation because I have come to value the tribally oriented scholarship of writers like Craig Womack (Muscogee), who has said, very reasonably, that if you want to understand Native American literature, you had better know something about the tribal context from which it came.⁸ This approach seemed to fit with what I was hearing from community members, too: Passamaquoddy people read very deeply among Passamaquoddy writers; Wampanoag people had detailed knowledge of the chronology of Wampanoag historians and poets; Narragansett people had a distinct sense of literary genealogy emanating from that 1935 magazine. In the table of contents, these tribal nations are organized more or less north to south, and readers unfamiliar with the territory can follow many of the locations that appear in the writings along almost any regional map. One virtue of this pattern is that it highlights some connections across communities: for instance, among Wabanaki peoples in Maine and between Narragansett and Wampanoag groups in southern New England.

I should note that my choice to organize the volume this way also created some exclusions. “Nations”—conceived of as ethnic/cultural entities that coincide with geopolitical borders—are modern constructs; as the Kanien'kehaka political theorist Taiaiake Alfred has pointedly remarked, “Neither the state-sponsored modifications to the colonial-municipal model (imposed in Canada through the Indian Act and in the United States through the Indian Reorganization Act) nor the corporate or public-government systems recently negotiated in the North constitute indigenous governments at all” (3). Put a little more simply, political designations like “Abenaki” or “Schaghticoke” are relatively recent arrivals and don’t necessarily reflect the variety of bands and communities that consider themselves affiliated yet distinct. Moreover, the exigencies of book publishing, combined with the exigencies of the community-editor model itself, meant that some nations fell out altogether—the fault of the process, not any indication that these groups have no writing worth including. The Pequots, for instance—a huge omission in this book—are inundated with requests to “collaborate” with scholars, often hesitant to become involved with researchers they don’t know well, and (as happened as this project came to deadline) simply oversubscribed with other work. Yet there is a considerable body of Pequot writing that reaches back before the monumental figure of William Apess and continues up to the filmmaker Rebecca Perry Levy. The bibliographies throughout the book are meant to direct readers to some of those omissions.

My original intent was to limit this collection to original writing, not transcribed oral tradition, and to writing in English, not in Native languages. Transcribed oral traditions have a vexed history, especially in anthologies; many of the most enduring “Indian” collections, like Jerome Rothenberg’s Shaking the Pumpkin: Traditional Poetry of the Indian North Americas (1972), aren’t really “Indian” at all but consist of loose “translations” of traditional narratives and other forms.⁹ Leslie Marmon Silko (Laguna) once derided transcribed oral narratives as outright cultural theft, on the grounds that these traditions were either completely misrepresented in print or never should have been written down in the first place.¹⁰ And then there is the whole genre of “as-told-to” American Indian memoirs, of which Black Elk Speaks is only the most notorious, which are often much more heavily edited than their non-Native “coauthors” have been inclined to admit.¹¹

On the other hand, the community editors for this volume often insisted that transcribed oral traditions, and certainly Native-language texts, were among their most important literary productions. In some cases, Native people like Claudia Chicklas (Abenaki) have written down family traditions on their own. Others, like Jesse Bruchac (Abenaki) or Ella Sekatau (Narragansett), have retranslated earlier writings into their indigenous languages or created altogether new writing in those languages. Even some of the more “corrupt” texts by non-Native ethnographers, like Abby Alger’s recordings of stories from Maine, sometimes appear in the bibliographies of this book, because they have been useful to Native communities, often reappropriated by them for purposes of cultural and linguistic revitalization.

One final editorial choice worth noting is my decision to organize the literature chronologically. I wanted to emphasize continuous presence—the reality that indigenous people have written, and written in English, since very soon after European arrival and have continued to do so, in every Euro-American form as well as some deeply “indigenous” ones. But readers will immediately notice large historical gaps in each chapter. Again, the absence (to take just one example) of very early Schaghticoke writings doesn’t mean that Schaghticoke people weren’t writing in the seventeenth century; it means only that the community editors chose to emphasize more recent work. Hopefully, readers will take these gaps as invitations to try and find, reprint, and reread that literature; at the very least, readers should be aware that the gaps tell us much more about Native people’s access to (and perhaps interest in) the mechanics of publishing and preservation than they do about what Native people were actually writing at a given historical moment.

In choosing which texts to present, and how, I deferred to the community editors, though they varied in how they approached these choices. Some took almost total responsibility for collecting the writings. The outstandingly efficient Stephanie Fielding (Mohegan) put a notice in the tribal newsletter calling for submissions; she and I were also in frequent conversation about the evolving chapter with then-Tribal Librarian/Archivist Faith Davison and Medicine Woman Melissa Tantaquidgeon Zobel. In Maine, Donald Soctomah (Passamaquoddy) solicited contributions through his extensive interpersonal networks; Cheryl Stedler (Nipmuc), working from her home in New Jersey, collected writing almost entirely via email, while also combing through her own extensive archives.

While some living writers (particularly those who are already published) asked the editorial team to choose which texts to include, we always encouraged them to submit pieces of their own choice. This method—which Lisa Brooks has called a “relinquishment of editorial control to the gathering place”—yielded some fascinating continuities, as in the Abenaki case (where many writers “home in” on the Connecticut River Valley), or the Wampanoag case (where writers return to particular events in colonial history).¹²

The Penobscots have a unique structure, an entire Cultural and Historic Preservation Department, which asks scholars working with Penobscot materials to come discuss their work in progress. So although Carol Dana, the Penobscot community editor, was relatively hands-off herself when it came to determining which texts were in or out, the Penobscot chapter benefited from input from a sizable group of knowledgeable and authoritative tribal members, who weighed in about which writers they felt best represented Penobscot history and interests.

In a few cases, community editors had distinct visions of what they wanted their respective tribal sections to accomplish. Joan Tavares Avant (Wampanoag) came to the project with a distinct historical mission, wanting to highlight the Wampanoags' continuous presence at Mashpee and Aquinnah; as such, she tended to gravitate toward historical writings. Two editors from up north, each working with some of the larger slates of published tribal writing, crafted chapters that emphasize tribal writing as a nation-building enterprise. Jaime Battiste (Mi'kmaq) is a legal scholar, and as such, he chose texts that demonstrate the continuity and power of Mi'kmaq law and sovereignty. Lisa Brooks (Abenaki), whose knowledge of early regional Native writing is encyclopedic, strategically selected texts underscoring Abenaki commitment to tribal homeland, community, language, and story. These chapters, and others, challenge the very shape of "New England" by showing how these tribal nations preexisted, and continue to traverse, state and national borders.

Not all Native communities have such well-oiled intratribal communicative structures or elders or junior scholars with the time and resources to coordinate a tribal anthology. This meant that some nations were not quite ready to be included, even though tribal members expressed interest and even though those nations have produced ample bodies of writing (e.g., Golden Hill Paugussett in Connecticut). This nearly happened with the Maliseet chapter, but Juana Perley (one of several Maliseet people with whom I had been in conversation with over the past few years) stepped in at the last moment to provide an introduction to the small slate of literature I had been able to amass with guidance from her and some of the other Maliseet writers included here.

Even where tribal input was the most widespread and vigorous (e.g., Mohegan, Penobscot, and Passamaquoddy), "tribal input" should not be taken to mean that any tribe has somehow "officially" signed off on the present project—nor, certainly, that every tribal member would agree with every selection or even approve of the direction of the tribal chapter overall. All of the community editors were keenly aware of the limitations of the anthology, particularly because we needed to set limits on the length of tribal chapters lest the book become too big to print, and finally because we needed to impose deadlines lest the book never appear at all. Under such constraints, everyone involved in this project readily acknowledges that the current selection is only a snapshot of much larger literary traditions—that, indeed, they were often working from the knowledge, memory, and agendas of a finite number of people, not from any “objective,” definitive determination of what constituted the “best” writings. Karen Kilcup is probably right that every anthology, wittingly or unwittingly, creates a “miniature canon,” but anthologists can at least remind themselves, and their readers: It could have been otherwise.

Many standard statements of editorial practice, particularly in academic books, give readers a sense of what to look for in terms of uniformity—where and how obvious misspellings were corrected, and so on. This was difficult in the present volume for several reasons.

Among the many forms of violence that Euro-Americans have inflicted on Native people, there is editorial violence. It isn’t inflicted only on indigenous writers (Emily Dickinson’s distinctive and indispensable punctuation was initially “corrected” out of existence), but editing has a particular, colonial baggage in Native literary history. One of the premises of this volume is that Native people began writing in English very early on, for purposes of cultural survival and self-determination; but it has to be acknowledged as well that they did so precisely because writing initially arrived as another form of colonial violence. Some of the earliest writings reproduced here (like the Dartmouth and Carlisle school letters) show how authorities often coerced Native people to write what they wanted to hear. By the late nineteenth century many writers, like Lewis Mitchell (Passamaquoddy), were being heavily edited, in ways that we can’t always know or reconstruct.

Heavy editing and influence over content are also not peculiar to Native writing; all writing, Native or non-Native, is mediated. Anyone who has ever taught writing—or, for that matter, anyone who has ever written a sentence for another’s inspection—knows this; but in practice, most writers and editors also find themselves newly surprised (and sometimes alarmed) by how readily “correcting” a text slides into changing its meaning. The writers and editors working on Dawnland Voices knew it too, and we had some interesting conversations, and occasional disagreements, about what to change, what to annotate, what to edit.

The bulk of this writing was initially unpublished or self-published in the form of small-run pamphlets through entities like Amazon or (increasingly) online; some were also originally disseminated through small, low-budget local newsletters. In turn, some of those were archived in small personal and tribal collections, sometimes as clippings or digital photographs without complete information about their provenance. Native communities, in fact, maintain remarkably good stewardship of their literary traditions—far better stewardship, in many cases, than the best-funded libraries and the most esteemed publishing houses—but they don’t necessarily do it according to the mandates of those institutions. Some of the texts included below, then, lack some of the attribution of titles, dates, and other information that academics tend to demand.

Further, as noncommercial, community-oriented works with limited distribution, many of these poems, stories, and speeches contained most of the mechanical errors and inconsistencies you usually find in such publications. Where it was immediately apparent that errors were genuinely errors, the community editors and I made a first pass at correcting them, followed by professional copyeditors. My own wish was to make corrections with the lightest possible hand, so as not to sacrifice some of the aesthetic edginess that, personally, I have always found most challenging and interesting as a reader of Native American literature. Still, in some cases writers pushed back; so readers accustomed to the more uniform editing practices of university presses may be brought up short by some idiosyncratic choices across the collection—in capitalization or in poetic syntax, for instance. In other cases, some authors chose not to make their birth years known; still others preferred not to annotate certain Native-language terms, events, or locations.

Tlingit author Nora Marks Dauenhauer, who has worked with non-academic Tlingit community members to record traditional stories, has explained this dynamic usefully: she finds that community members are usually “eager to write down local traditions, but are not willing to learn and use a standard orthography,” adding that, “[w]hereas literacy is perceived by teachers, linguists and folklorists as a purely technical matter, for members of the indigenous community it can be a profound emotional issue deeply bound up with group identity and self-concept” (Dauenhauer and Dauenhauer 13). Therefore, as much as possible we (community editors, copyeditors, the press, and I) tried to respect authors’ stated wishes. If the author is living, we returned the piece to him or her for approval. Where the author is deceased, the community editors had the final say.

As all of these details about procedure might suggest, Dawnland Voices has been years in the making, and the manuscript and its individual submissions have gone through countless iterations. When I say we respected authors’ wishes “as much as possible,” I mean “as much as we could manage and control,” given the large number of people involved in submitting, reading, formatting, and editing the text. Any writer who has published knows that from time to time undesired changes and errors slip through even the most scrupulous editing processes. I take full responsibility for any such changes or errors.

Once you deliberately involve even more than the usual hordes of people in the production of a book, you become acutely aware that everything—the table of contents, the arrangement of the materials, the editing—could indeed have been otherwise. In this sense the community editors and I were like teachers creating a course syllabus. Teachers have a finite number of days to cover a topic, so they are forced to make hard choices, always aware that there are other choices that could do just as well. Classes have to start at a certain point with a subject, after all, and teachers have to make decisions, justifying them as best they can. Most of the best teachers I know are continually revising their classes, and many even “de-center” them by inviting students to contribute readings and assignments.

Some of the community editors and I started to wonder: what if we could do this with a book? The rapidly expanding and shifting world of digital publishing is opening up (and complicating) just such possibilities for the dissemination of writing, for literary form, for conversations among authors and readers. As this book goes to press, a few of the editors and I, along with some of my students, are starting to experiment with web-based anthologizing. Writing of Indigenous New England (indigenousewengland.com) promises to be a wonderfully rich and easy-to-use interface allowing writers, tribal historic preservation officers, local archivists, and others at different locations to upload materials of their own choice, annotating and editing them as they see fit.

We can think of Dawnland Voices as a hub and the website as offering different “spokes.”¹³ The first spoke is a collaborative bibliography. In the tribal chapters that follow, we offer bibliographies that help readers find further literature within particular tribal traditions. But bibliographies, of course, are infinitely extensible, so we have created a collaborative online listing available for additions, subtractions, and revisions from anyone who cares to log on (https://www.zotero.org/groups/indigenous_new_england_literature).

The second spoke (or set of spokes) is our online exhibit space, since the anthology itself is also extensible. In Writing of Indigenous New England, authorized editors and contributors can begin uploading the many texts we couldn’t include in this book: letters from family archives, tribal newsletters, out-of-print poetry and fiction, even born-digital work. Our website uses the Omeka platform developed by George Mason University’s Center for History and New Media; this platform allows curators to organize material by “collection” (in our case, by tribal nation) or by “exhibit.” To date, I have found that an exhibit makes an excellent project for a class and a community partner: college students can provide the interpretive and technical work that a local historical society or tribal historian might need in preserving and disseminating materials. Our first exhibit—a collaboration between the Mt. Kearsarge Indian Museum in Warner, New Hampshire, and students in ENG 740: Native American Writing before 1800—focused on Abenaki baskets as texts. It is my hope that colleagues at other universities will partner with tribal historians, authors, museums, and other entities to produce new knowledge about regional indigenous literary traditions.

Finally, any book can be a hub for conversation and exchange among readers and writers, so another “spoke” of our online site involves social networking. One of the most enjoyable and enlightening parts of compiling this anthology was the part that, right now, most readers can’t see: the conversations, questions, and debates that surrounded particular texts or editorial decisions. Writing of Indigenous New England has an online reading group (brokered at goodreads.com) where readers, students, tribal community members, and authors can “speak back” to the literature, explaining what makes it meaningful, even arguing with it and generating new writing in response.

In both print and online formats, regional indigenous writings could see their “afterlives” greatly expanded—to borrow a term from the literary historian Janice Radway, who has been writing about another marginalized body of work: 1990s girl “zines.” Radway’s assessment of these edgy, low-budget magazines resonates nicely with many of the texts contained in Dawnland Voices: she views them as “complex aesthetic performances that defy and disorient those who would try to make sense of them in conventional ways” (147). Like many other disempowered groups, Native American people will continue to write, often defining and promoting that writing in opposition to (or through sheer lack of interest in) academic ideas about what constitutes literary value. Still, while an academically sanctioned anthology may not be necessary for the existence of the tradition, we should still take seriously its capacity to “interject the voices and works of [Native people] into the legitimated precincts of knowledge production—that is, into magazines and books, libraries, and schools and universities” and, as such, to “render [them] not merely visible but audible” (Radway 145).

Hopefully Dawnland Voices contributes something to the visibility and audibility of Native American literature from New England. If there is one thing that everyone involved in this book seems happy about, it’s that it is only the beginning of much longer projects and collaborations—hopefully with some of the people who are reading it today.

Notes

1. See Studies in American Indian Literatures 24.3 (Fall 2012), a special issue that Margaret Lukens and I guest-edited.
2. Some newer anthologies are doing a better job of acknowledging New England Native writers; see, for instance, Parker’s Changing Is Not Vanishing. One fascinating older exception, heavier on New England selections, was Literature of the American Indian (1973), edited by Thomas Sanders and a Narragansett-Wampanoag man, Walter Peek. Another unusually capacious anthology was Returning the Gift—not surprising, as it was edited by Abenaki author and publisher Joseph Bruchac. The Cherokee writer-editor MariJo Moore is usually attuned to writers from around the United States and Canada; she included Carol Bachofner (Abenaki) in Genocide of the Mind. Thoughtful anthologies focusing on other regions of the United States include those by Hobson, Tigerman and Ottery, and Sarris.

3. For a discussion of vanishing-Indian mythology in the South, see Geary Hobson, Janet McAdams, and Kathryn Walkiewicz's excellent anthology of Native writing from that region, The People Who Stayed.
4. Jean O'Brien's Dispossession by Degrees explains in considerable detail how New England people's land bases were reduced. Eva Garrouette's (Cherokee) Real Indians provides an indispensable introduction to how policies like blood-quantum regulations have legislated indigenous identities.
5. See, for instance, Boissevain.
6. E.g., Miles 192.
7. Among historians, Colin Calloway has led the way, publishing several groundbreaking essays by colleagues in After King Philip's War. Among archaeologists, Robert Goodby deserves special note, along with the other researchers represented in Jordan Kerber's Cross-cultural Collaboration.
8. This is the argument Womack has famously made in Red on Red. Other scholars working in this vein include Weaver, Warrior, Justice, Kelsey, Lisa Brooks, and the writers in Janice Acoose et al., Reasoning Together.
9. See Parker, Invention of Native American Literature, 83ff.
10. Silko, "Old-Time Indian Attack."
11. On Black Elk, see DeMallie.
12. Lisa Brooks, personal communication, August 16, 2011. I borrow the term "home in" from an influential essay by William Bevis, who described the plots of many Native American novels as organized around a return to homeland.
13. Following Renya Ramirez's important book Native Hubs, I made a similar argument about the poetry of Mihku Paul (Maliseet) and Alice Azure (Mi'kmaq) in "Rethinking Recognition."

Works Cited

- Acoose, Janice, et al. Reasoning Together: The Native Critics Collective. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 2008. Print.
- Adelson, Naomi. "Being Alive Well": Health and the Politics of Cree Well-Being. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000. Print.
- Alfred, Taiaiake. Peace, Power, Righteousness: An Indigenous Manifesto. Don Mills ON: Oxford University Press, 1999. Print.
- Alger, Abby. In Indian Tents: Stories Told by Penobscot, Passamaquoddy and Micmac Indians. Honolulu: University Press of the Pacific, 2006. Print.
- Apess, William. On Our Own Ground: The Complete Writings of William Apess, a Pequot. Ed. Barry O'Connell. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992. Print.
- Bevis, William. "Native American Novels: Homing In." In Recovering the Word: Essays on Native American Literature. Ed. Brian Swann and Arnold Krupat. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987. 580–620. Print.
- Bird, Gloria, and Joy Harjo, eds. Reinventing the Enemy's Language: Contemporary Native Women's Writings of North America. New York: W. W. Norton, 1998. Print.

- Boissevain, Ethel. "The Detribalization of the Narragansett Indians: A Case Study." Ethnohistory 3.3 (1956): 225–45. Web. 22 Aug. 2011.
- Brooks, Joanna, and Samson Occom. The Collected Writings of Samson Occom, Mohegan: Literature and Leadership in Eighteenth-Century Native America. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006. Print.
- Brooks, Lisa. The Common Pot: The Recovery of Native Space in the Northeast. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2008. Print.
- Bross, Kristina, and Hilary Wyss, eds. Early Native Literacies in New England: A Documentary Anthology. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2008. Print.
- Bruchac, Joseph. Returning the Gift: Poetry and Prose from the First North American Native Writers' Festival. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1994. Print.
- Calloway, Colin G. After King Philip's War: Presence and Persistence in Indian New England. Hanover NH: Dartmouth University Press, 1997. Print.
- Cruikshank, Julie. Life Lived Like a Story: Life Stories of Three Yukon Native Elders. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992. Print.
- Dauenhauer, Nora, and Richard Dauenhauer. "The Paradox of Talking on the Page: Some Aspects of the Tlingit and Haida Experience." Talking on the Page: Editing Aboriginal Oral Texts. Ed. Laura J. Murray and Keren Rice. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999. 3–41. Papers given at the Thirty-Second Annual Conference on Editorial Problems. Print.
- DeMallie, Raymond J. The Sixth Grandfather: Black Elk's Teachings Given to John G. Neihardt. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1985. Print.
- Garrouette, Eva Marie. Real Indians: Identity and the Survival of Native America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003. Print.
- Hobson, Geary, Janet McAdams, and Kathryn Walkiewicz, eds. The People Who Stayed: Southeastern Indian Writing after Removal. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 2010. Print.
- Justice, Daniel Heath. Our Fire Survives the Storm: A Cherokee Literary History. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2006. Print.
- Kelsey, Penelope Myrtle. Tribal Theory in Native American Literature: Dakota and Haudenosaunee Writing and Indigenous Worldviews. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2008. Print.
- Kerber, Jordan E. Cross-cultural Collaboration: Native Peoples and Archaeology in the Northeastern United States. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2006. Print.
- Kilcup, Karen. "The Poetry and Prose of Recovery Work." On Anthologies: Politics and Pedagogy. Ed. Jeffrey R. DiLeo. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2004. 112–34. Print.
- Lepore, Jill. The Name of War: King Philip's War and the Origins of American Identity. New York: Vintage, 1999. Print.
- Miles, Tiya. Ties That Bind: The Story of an Afro-Cherokee Family in Slavery and Freedom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006. Print.
- Moore, MariJo, ed. Genocide of the Mind: New Native American Writing. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press/Nation Books, 2003. Print.

- Nicolar, Joseph. The Life and Traditions of the Red Man: A Rediscovered Treasure of Native American Literature. 1891. Ed. Annette Kolodny. Durham NC: Duke University Press, 2007. Print.
- O'Brien, Jean M. Dispossession by Degrees: Indian Land and Identity in Natick, Massachusetts, 1650–1790. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2003. Print.
- . Firsting and Lasting: Writing Indians Out of Existence in New England. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2010. Print.
- Parker, Robert Dale. Changing Is Not Vanishing: A Collection of American Indian Poetry to 1930. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2010. Print.
- . The Invention of Native American Literature. Ithaca NY: Cornell University Press, 2003. Print.
- Purdy, John L., and James Ruppert, eds. Nothing but the Truth: An Anthology of Native American Literature. Upper Saddle River NJ: Prentice Hall, 2000. Print.
- Radway, Janice. "Zines, Half-Lives, and Afterlives: On the Temporalities of Social and Political Change." PMLA: Publications of the Modern Language Association of America 126.1 (2011): 140–50. Print.
- Ramirez, Renya. Native Hubs : Culture, Community, and Belonging in Silicon Valley and Beyond. Durham NC: Duke University Press, 2007. Print.
- Sanders, Thomas E., and Walter Peek, eds. Literature of the American Indian. Beverly Hills: Glencoe Press, 1973. Print.
- Sarris, Greg. The Sound of Rattles and Clappers: A Collection of New California Indian Writing. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1994. Print.
- Senier, Siobhan. "Rethinking Recognition: Mi'kmaq and Maliseet Poets Re-write Land and Community." MELUS: Multi-ethnic Literature of the U.S. 37.1 (2012): 15–34. Print.
- Silko, Leslie Marmon. "An Old-Time Indian Attack in Two Parts." The Remembered Earth. Ed. Geary Hobson. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1979. 211–16. Print.
- Tigerman, Kathleen, and Jim Ottery. Wisconsin Indian Literature: Anthology of Native Voices. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2006. Print.
- Warrior, Robert Allen. Tribal Secrets: Recovering American Indian Intellectual Traditions. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995. Print.
- Weaver, Jace. That the People Might Live: Native American Literatures and Native American Community. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997. Print.
- Wolfe, Patrick. Settler Colonialism and the Transformation of Anthropology: The Politics and Poetics of an Ethnographic Event. New York: Continuum, 1999. Print.
- Womack, Craig. Red on Red: Native American Literary Separatism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999. Print.